

On October 14, 2010, Southwest Airlines Co. posted the following Q&A on its lowfaresfarther.com website as well as on its intranet website.

Will relative seniority standing be affected when AirTran Crew Members (employees) become Employees of Southwest Airlines?

A: When air carriers merge operations, federal law requires that the respective seniority lists in crafts or classes subject to the Railway Labor Act be integrated in a “fair and equitable manner.” If agreement on seniority integration is not reached, the law provides for binding arbitration. Typically, the Unions representing affected Employees assume the primary responsibility for the integration process. If an existing collective bargaining agreement addresses seniority integration, the contractual provisions may be followed, so long as those provisions allow for the protection afforded by federal law. If two work groups are represented by the same Union, that Union’s internal policies for seniority integration may be followed. It is going to take time for the legal guidelines described to determine exactly what this means to you. In the meantime, it is clear that if an AirTran Crew Member (Employee) resigns from AirTran and is subsequently employed by Southwest Airlines, he or she will be coming to Southwest as any other New Hire.
